Film Program, 1977-80

Director: Ruby Rich

Program Analyst: Marsha Lebby

Program Assistant: Pamela Lent

Film in its many facets has long been a major fixture in American life, with a continual hold on both American popular and artistic imaginations. New York State has a long history of film activity, from pre-Hollywood productions to today's thriving independent filmmaking community and a growing return of commercial film production and financing. The long traditions of film as art and film as popular culture are ultimately entwined in providing subject and audience.

Recognizing this interdependence, the Council in its Film Program has responded to an increasingly articulate constituency by supporting a wide variety of professional organizations whose activities encourage the production, presentation, distribution and study of high quality film. A particular emphasis has been given to projects that increase public awareness, understanding and appreciation of film through community exhibition, workshops and forums for filmmakers in an effort to provide support structures necessary to film's continued vitality.

Over the three years reported here, Ira Wohl's poignant Best Boy (supported through the New York State Association for Retarded Children) won an Academy Award for documentary films (as had Barbara Kopple's Harlan County, U.S.A., supported by the Council in 1976-77). A special Academy Award was also presented to the Museum of Modern Art's film department in recognition of its many contributions to the art of film; Council support there has assisted film preservation, exhibition and study programs.

The Council continued its support of the Film Society of Lincoln Center and its New York Film Festival, an international event where important new foreign and American films are screened. Each year the work of major established filmmakers and of new, lesser known directors receive premieres at this Festival. In 1979 the New York Film Festival was augmented by the addition of the American Independents Festival as a sidebar: supported in part by the Council through Film Fund, this separate series of screenings of independently-produced feature-length films was a critical and popular success, and for the first time secured prominent visibility for independent film. Other Council-supported outlets for independents over these years included Intermedia's American Mavericks Festival and Educational Broadcasting Corporation's (WNET) "Independent Focus" series.

The Black Filmmakers Cooperative and Film Forum presented, with Council support, a series of screenings involving dialogues between independent Black filmmakers from the New York area and community audiences. The films were shown in non-traditional screening facilities to broaden the reach of these artists' work.

The Film Program enlarged the range of the filmmaking process that it helps support in considering applications relating to screenwriting. The Writers Guild of America was supported by the Council in its offering of screenwriters' fellowships, which is combined with a "mentor" program that offers an original model for the development of young screenwriters.

As production requests grew in number, production guidelines for the Film Program were developed and expanded over the three years. Filmmakers now have a regularized source of potential support and can choose to apply in the more suitable of two categories (depending upon funding level). Also, professional film production internships are now supported by the Council; internships at the Astoria Motion Picture Studios that provided interns the opportunity to work on professional productions there were among these.

Cine Information was supported in the development of a computer system intended to pair users of independent films with filmmakers working on specific subjects. Independent Cinema Artists and Producers and the Foundation for Independent Video and Film received support toward developing public television markets for independent film.

The Film Program offers support in a number of distinct categories. Among recent films receiving support for Production expenses were Steve Forman, Abbie Fink and Dennis Lanson's The Phans of Jersey City (through Brooklyn Arts and Culture Association); Robert Gardner's Clarence and Angel (through Children's Art Carnival); Ken Kobland's The Lost Ones (through Performing Artservices); and Mikhail Bogin's A Private Life. Organizations conducting Film Workshops included Brooklyn Arts and Culture Association, Frederick Douglass Creative Arts Center and Women's Interart Center. Among recipients in the category of General Organizational Support were the Astoria Motion Picture and Television Foundation, the Film Society of Lincoln Center and the Foundation for Independent Video and Film.

Services to the field, a category including information access and distribution, were performed by such organizations as the Center for Arts Information, Educational Film Library Association and the New York Public Library. Exhibition projects are supported; groups providing these included Black Filmmakers Cooperative, Film Forum and New Community Cinema Club.

Other categories (and some of their recipients) were: Film Series (Museum of the American Indian; Polish Community Center of Buffalo; Troy Public Library); Festivals (92nd Street YM-YWHA; Film Society of Lincoln Center); Film Acquisition (Mid-Hudson Library System; Chautauqua-Cattaraugus Library System); Equipment Access (Young Filmmakers Foundation; Media Study; Portable Channel); Publications (Cine Information; Millenium Film Workshops; Educational Film Library Association); Archival and Preservation (International Museum of Photography; Museum of Modern Art); Broadcast/Telecast (Educational Broadcasting Corporation; Independent Cinema Artists and Producers); and Special Projects (Black Filmmakers Cooperative).

A newly instituted category of support, beginning in 1980-81, is Arts Programming for Television, in which film art takes another art form as its subject, thereby securing a broader audience for both.

MEDIA PROGRAM

Director: John Giancola

The Media Program at the New York State Council on the Arts was developed in 1970; during the Program's ten years of growth. New York State has gained recognition as an international center for alternative uses of television and radio and innovative trends in video, audio and multi-media. Aesthetic accomplishments in color and form have been created through electronic compositions; serious statements that challenge the control of viewership by commercial television have been produced; television technology has been taken apart, re-designed and reconstructed to make it a more varied performance medium for the artist; societal and personal concerns have been expressed in new formats; community video has flourished; artists have turned their cameras on the other arts in order to find new ways to capture them for television; and works that address the very basis of perception itself have come out of the video field as have documentaries of professional caliber on a myriad of interesting subjects.

During the three years of this report, the Council has directed funds to numerous areas of the media field to assist in the development of this relatively new and unique art form. In some areas, Council support appears to have been essential to its development. Because of the costs of high technology (a disadvantage offset by the tremendous audience potential of media), artist participation would perhaps have been severely limited, if not for Council support of production and post-production facilities. Through the Council's Production Program, scores of artists in audio and video have emerged to create a recognized body of work through co-producing organizations (such as public television stations and media centers). Council support of Post-Production Facilities has helped to make possible such excellent editing and finishing facilities as the TV Lab at Channel 13 and the Sound Studios at ZBS Foundation. Council support has also been provided to Media Resource Centers such as Media Study in Buffalo, a multi-function organization where production work, exhibition, promotion, advertising and curatorship may be done under one roof.

The Service Projects Program has supported organizations that provide video and audio arts with information, studies, distribution, publications and advocacy. Statewide service organizations include the Media Equipment Rental Service, administered by Young Filmmaker's Foundation, and the Media Bureau, administered by the Kitchen Center for Video, Music and Dance. Both organizations additionally serve as re-grant agencies for modest expenses including speakers' fees, public screenings, residencies and production. Under the Exhibition Program, the Council has supported the Museum of Modern Art, the Whitney Museum of American Art, The Kitchen Center for Video, Music and Dance, Media Study, and Visual Studies Workshop for their enthusiastic and dedicated video departments which acquire, exhibit and study this new art form. The Chautauqua, Mid-York, Mid-Hudson, and New York Public Libraries have also developed impressive archives and exhibition programs in video for the public, and in 1978-79, the American Film Festival added video to its screening schedule with Council support. The Council's Workshop Program in video has also flourished with the small format, easy-to-use video equipment allowing a variety of artistic applications from training for the community to experimentation with dance notation.

A newly instituted category of support, beginning in 1980-81, is Arts Programming for Television, in which video art takes another art form as its subject, thereby securing a broader audience for both.

Council funds for media arts are disbursed across the state. But the field of media also has a special quality about its production and dissemination process that makes all media ventures typically state-wide. Media artists themselves are mobile in the electronic arts and will travel to another part of the state to work if they need equipment of certain specifications or are attracted to the access policy of a particular organization. For example, sophisticated computer editing of television tapes is available to artists primarily in the Manhattan, Central New York and Genesee Valley areas. Artists are also aware that the Capital area offers one of the finest audio laboratories, and the Experimental Television Center in Chemung Valley is well known as a place where electronic artists may re-design the electronic equipment. The work media artists produce and exhibit may be broadcast across the state or mailed as a video or audiotape to any part of the state. In this way, the media art form is constantly "on tour."

As successfully as the media arts have developed in New York State, there remains a need in the field for greater development, access for the field itself, and stability. Networking systems for television programming need to be researched and developed, as do video laboratories for beginners and artists from other disciplines who wish to begin experimenting with the medium of television but have no access to cameras on an informal or inexpensive basis. Finally, curatorial conferences and seminars would improve the visibility of the electronic arts and nurture the growth of a body of critical literature, and therefore also of an educated audience appreciation.
